Signs of possible ASD

A person of any age with ASD will have some delay or difficulty in all three development areas. For example, they might:

English

Communication

- be delayed in developing communication or language
- have unusual ways of making themselves understood (may use objects or another person's hand to indicate what s/he wants)
- find difficulty in understanding others (can sometimes appear to ignore or not to hear)
- use language in an unusual way (monotone voice, copy or echo what others say, use overly formal or academic language).

Social interaction

- not join in with play or social opportunities
- prefer to do things alone
- not respond to other people's greetings, smiles or waves
- not show toys, objects or share their interests with other people
- have difficulty with social situations, conversation or social rules.

Thinking (cognition) or behaviour

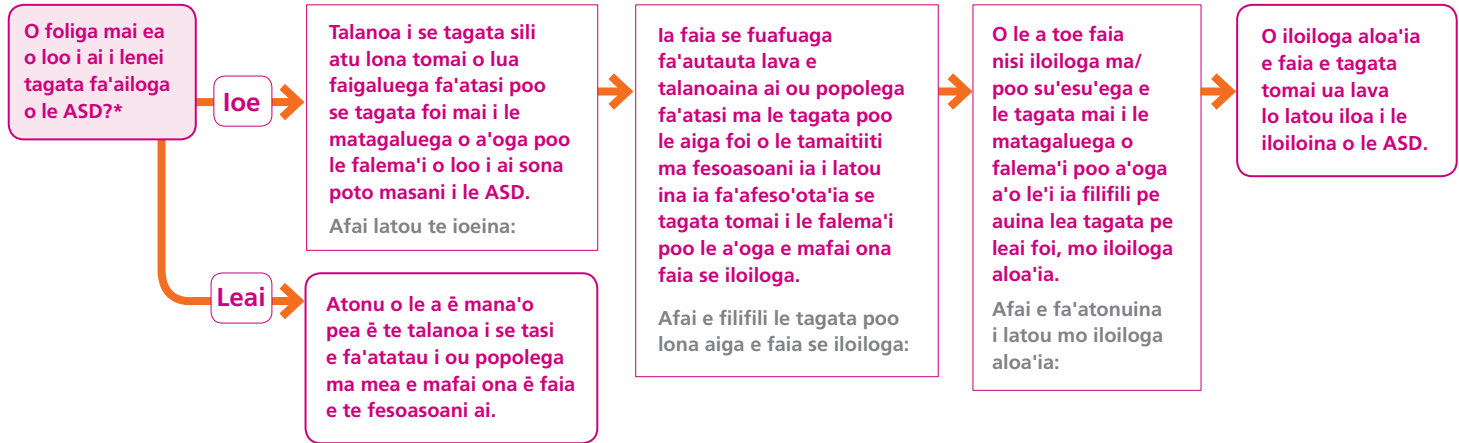

- need unusual rituals or routines (such as lining things up, completing tasks in a particular pattern, shutting doors etc)
- get very upset when moving from one task or place to another or when routines are interrupted
- make unusual movements near their eyes or face
- over-react to loud noises or be very sensitive to particular smells, tastes or textures
- have poor problem-solving or organisation skills
- have a strong interest which s/he likes to talk about and takes up a lot of time
- have poor coordination or motor skills.
